Extraterritorial Prison Plans and a Playlfsist in the Style of IKEA

In fall 2001 U.S. Navy Seabees began refurbishing and constructing of the first phase of the detention camps at the U.S. Navy Base in Guantánamo Bay on the southeast corner of Cuba. The first section of the camps had been previously used to house asylum seekers from Haiti and Cuba in the 1990s. It was called Camp X-Ray. It opened as a prison camp and interrogation center on January 11, 2002 under the jurisdiction of the U.S. Southern Command.

Camp X-Ray's prison cells were open air. Each cell consisted of a concrete slab foundation, a galvanized steel chain-link fence, and a metal roof. The cells measured eight feet by eight feet by eight feet (2.4 m cube). Because the cells did not have any plumbing prisoners were given two buckets, one was for water and the other was for waste.

Most of the prisoners were brought to Camp X-Ray on large transport airplanes from Afghanistan. Some came from other parts of the world. When they arrived they were given a kit consisting of two orange boiler suits, a sleeping mat, a blanket, a set of sheets, a wash cloth, two towels (one for washing and one for praying), a bar of soap, shampoo, a modified toothbrush, a tube of toothpaste, two buckets, a flask, a copy of the Koran, and a prayer cap.

On April 29, 2002 Camp X-Ray was closed. All the prisoners were moved to a new facility known as Camp Delta. Camp Delta consists of seven prison camps numbered one through six as well as one that has no number.

The following are plans for guard towers and prison cells. I have strived to make them as accurate as possible.
